Awesome musicians have learned that the world does not revolve around them – or their music on the stage. They are there to serve the leader, the song, and the community. Playing in the band is a privilege to them, and their gifts are at their best because they're not pushing for platform.

AWESOME disciples

Awesome musicians have actually decided to follow Jesus in their private and public life.

They don't confuse playing in the band with being a growing

Christian in their attitudes, actions, and hidden choices. They are a part of the Church because of Jesus' call – not because of a band role.

AWESOME players

Awesome musicians are constantly working on their craft. They understand that good music is made by players who know by experience when to play, when not to play, and when to learn new tricks. They get beyond their own preferences and styles in music, and learn to play in styles the leader requests.

AWESOME worshippers

Awesome musicians recognize that their own life of engagement in worship deeply affects the team – and the congregation. They pay attention to making good music, but are always looking to get beyond the music to find a place of meeting with God – for themselves and others.

leaders

Awesome musicians recognize that a worship team is about more than the music – it is a community of musicians and techs serving the calling, values, and mission of their local church. This makes them good friends, encouragers, and even pastors to other team members, leaders, and the congregation.

supports

Awesome musicians make themselves busy supporting the other musicians (of every caliber) and the worship leader, whenever they get the opportunity. They're not lost in their own "part to play." They show up early, are ready to go at downbeat time, learn the new songs, and show they're for team success.

AWESOME heroes

Awesome musicians are living their lives by design, with the intention and focus of a hero. They say “yes” to some things, and “no” to others because they have a sense of purpose and destiny in Christ. They’re not willy-nilly about life – they care for their souls, their families, and for those God has given to them.
